Hello

You can do natural science courses at so many different universities globally. Not all of these ask for high a level grades, or their equivalents. You ask for A*A*A with a requirement of a Science background.

Why do you ask for such high a level entry grades?

What is the point of selecting for such a high calibre of student to do your courses?

I guarantee you your courses are just as hard as any other.

People with C's could do them just fine.

Yet you do not allow people with C's into Cambridge.

As a minimum, you ask for 2 A* grades and 1 A which is ridiculously high and far too overpriced.

Regards

Tom

Dear Tom

Thank you for your email.

Undergraduate courses at the University of Cambridge are academically very demanding. Therefore our entry requirements are set at a level so as to ensure that those students admitted will be able to cope with the rigorous demands of the course and thrive academically during their studies.

Best wishes

Tracy

Hello

Thanks for your email

I understand the university offers music awards, and on the contrary it also offers degrees in the natural and physical sciences

Is there any distinguishing these very different fields in terms of academic demand at Cambridge?

Regards

Tom

Dear Tom

Thank you for your email.

The allocation of Music awards is something completely different to the assessment of academic ability. Students applying for a music award would need to be an organist, a singer/chorister or instrumentalist of a very high standard, and also reach the academic requirements for the undergraduate course that they would be applying for.

We are not involved with the allocation of Music Awards from this office, further details regarding these can be found here: Music awards | Undergraduate Study (cam.ac.uk)
